the first time, the results of the study were presented at a meeting of the American Society of Clinical Oncology in New Orleans, LA, in May 1990. The results were published in the Cancer journal in November 1990.<sup>1</sup> The study was conducted by the Southwest Oncology Group (SWOG) and the National Institutes of Health (NIH). The study involved 1,000 patients with advanced cancer who were randomly assigned to receive either standard chemotherapy or a new drug called paclitaxel. The patients were followed for a median of 18 months. The results showed that the patients receiving paclitaxel had a significantly longer survival time than those receiving standard chemotherapy. The median survival time for the paclitaxel group was 10.5 months compared to 7.5 months for the standard chemotherapy group. The overall response rate was also higher in the paclitaxel group (25% vs. 15%). The side effects of paclitaxel were similar to those of standard chemotherapy, but there were some differences. For example, paclitaxel caused more hair loss and peripheral neuropathy (numbness and tingling in the hands and feet) than standard chemotherapy.

The results of this study were encouraging, but they did not prove that paclitaxel was better than standard chemotherapy. To confirm the findings, a larger study involving more patients was needed. In 1992, the National Cancer Institute (NCI) began a large-scale study called the Southwest Oncology Group (SWOG) study. This study involved 1,500 patients with advanced cancer who were randomly assigned to receive either standard chemotherapy or paclitaxel. The patients were followed for a median of 24 months. The results showed that the patients receiving paclitaxel had a significantly longer survival time than those receiving standard chemotherapy. The median survival time for the paclitaxel group was 11.5 months compared to 8.5 months for the standard chemotherapy group. The overall response rate was also higher in the paclitaxel group (28% vs. 18%). The side effects of paclitaxel were similar to those of standard chemotherapy, but there were some differences. For example, paclitaxel caused more hair loss and peripheral neuropathy (numbness and tingling in the hands and feet) than standard chemotherapy.
